An Examination of the Health of Minority Communities in the United States (3)
This course will review health in various minority communities in the United States today. The course will explore the impact of health and health issues on the community from the perspective of community residents, health and human service providers, insurers/third party payers, and community support networks.
The course will include an overview of each ethnic group studied and the major health and health status issues they are confronted with from a historical perspective. There will be a discussion of definitions pertaining to health and health status and identification of key indicators (e.g. genetic, biologic, clinical, behavioral, environmental, and sociological) utilized to define and assess the health status of individuals and population groups. Using national surveys and reports, the course will review and describe the health issues for the different communities as a whole and, where applicable, look at the differences that may exist among subgroups which make up each community. This would include examining some of the theories that have been proposed to explain the variations in health status.
There will be a discussion of the various minority communities as they have been defined and described by national and international authorities and organizations such as the United States government (Census Bureau and other federal agencies like the US Department of Health and Human Services) and international organizations such as the World Health Organization, from an historical perspective and those currently accepted. The course would also address the influence these definitions have in terms of defining goals for health, health policy development, and related resource allocation/distribution.
The national debate on Health Care Reform and the controversy surrounding the United States federal legislation will be discussed. This will include a review of the research literature on health disparities and health equity. Special focus will be on the discussion of the impact of this dialogue on the policies and decisions that ultimately could affect the allocation and distribution of health and human services resources. The discussion will address renewed emphasis on national health care coverage and the impact this could have on the status of health for minority communities in the United States.
