The Master of Arts in Communication at the University at Albany offers a blend of theoretical and applied study, preparing graduates for the challenge of workforce leadership or the rigor of doctoral education. The program furthers strategic capabilities with a curriculum designed to foster problem solving and innovative thought. As a result, our graduates are strongly positioned to meet the challenges of our ever-changing global society as dynamic communication leaders.

Students can pursue personal interests within one of four concentrations:

- Health Communication
- Interpersonal and Intercultural Communication
- Organizational Communication
- Political Communication

“I produced good work, made great connections and accomplished things I didn’t think possible in two years. It was a worthwhile experience.”

Linsey Marchione, M.A. in Communication Graduate

RAISING THE BAR: RESEARCH AND INTERNSHIPS

Faculty research and graduate internships are valuable components of the Communication curriculum. Faculty research in areas such as new communication technologies, e-government, mass media effects, ethnic media organizations, interactions in healthcare settings, communication and health in under-resourced communities, and the impact of modernity on interpersonal interactions, provides a deeper understanding of the coursework. To gain hands-on experience, students may seek an internship within a variety of sectors. Past internship sites include American Red Cross, General Electric, New York State Assembly, Sirius XM Radio, Starbucks and the World Health Organization.
“When you enroll in the MA program in Communication you’ll join a dynamic community of scholar-educators and students. The program brings diverse theories and methods to engaging with communication problems and opportunities generated by new technologies and an increasingly interdependent, pluralistic society.”

Dr. Annis Golden, Associate Professor
