The Process and Design of An Evaluation Tool to Assess the Effectiveness of Programs Addressing Minority Health in New York State

Author (s)

Dwayne Robertson

The poster will explain the process of the design and the future implementation of an evaluation tool that assesses the effectiveness of community based programs that address disparities in minority health. The targeted areas of interest include programs that address diabetes, stroke, heart disease, and asthma. The poster will include information on the process surrounding research on health disparities, community based interventions, culturally linguistically appropriate standards (CLAS), and program evaluation.

Furthermore, the poster will include information and visual diagrams about the process and theoretical design of evaluation tool, including feedback from a conference call presentation conducted by intern about CLAS standards to a number of community based organizations. Future plans are to use the refined evaluation tool on identified community based organizations addressing health issues in targeted areas of interest, and to compile a compendium of effective programs to disseminate to the community at large.
