		Creative nonfiction is an umbrella term for works that depict true events, enriched by relevant thoughtful ideas, personal insight, and intimacies about life and our world. Perhaps now more than ever, personal stories matter. This intermediate nonfiction prose course will offer students a space to investigate their selves and their voices in relationship to the broader contexts they exist within. This course is meant to be a generative writing workshop. We will write new work every week, practicing the fundamental skills of creative nonfiction and expanding our range of techniques. We will study classic, contemporary, and emerging forms, including but not limited to, personal essays, memoirs, lyrical essays, and prose essays dealing with issues in history, science, nature, travel, and culture. By the end of the course you will have a substantial body of new work and a more nuanced understanding of the creative nonfiction genre. All course readings and materials will be available on the course Brightspace page, including a complete syllabus, course schedule, and additional guiding documents to help you through the course. This online class is fully asynchronous, meaning we will not meet in person or online in real time. However, this is not a self-paced class; there are due dates for all work to which you must adhere. This class is half the length of a normal semester, but the same amount of credit hours and work; you must manage your time wisely to be successful in this class.
