Calling for a National Movement to Offer College Degrees in Every Prison

There has been recent rapid growth in the number of colleges and universities offering classes to people in prison. This proliferation of programming raises important questions for correctional policy, among them: Are college programs good for prisons? What does it take to make a college-in-prison program succeed? To be affordable for providers? What makes for a "good" college program for people in prison? How does college-in-prison relate to the problem of mass incarceration?
